Program Characteristics:

Executive Summary

Latino males 12-18 years old are held in detention at disproportionately high rates in part because they lack supervised housing in the community. The Department of Community Justice (DCJ) proposes a cheaper, more effective option: contract for short-term (30 day) shelter care and staff to link them to services for 30 youth each year.

Program Description

Research shows that detained youth are more likely to commit new crimes. For this reason, DCJ detains youth only when objective criteria indicate public safety is at risk. In FY 2005, DCJ detained 44 Latino youth in spite of the risk criteria, often because youth were undocumented and lacked stable housing to which they could be released. This rate was 7% higher than for White youth, and 13% more than for African-American youth (who have access to shelter care like that proposed here). To address these barriers and invest safety dollars in less costly alternatives to detention (a shelter bed costs $120 a day, while a detention bed costs $215), DCJ would contract with a community provider for 5 shelter beds for Latino males 12-18 awaiting trial and permanent placements. Young males could stay for up to 28 days, participate in structured activities, and have staff link them to health care, employment, and school, as well as cultural education and Latino role models.

Program Justification

This program enables the juvenile justice system to hold juvenile offenders accountable, while assuring that they receive fair and equitable treatment. With these beds, fewer Latino youth have to be detained simply because culturally appropriate alternatives do not exist. In addition, this program is cost-effective and research-based because it reserves $215/day detention beds for the highest risk youth and provides culturally-specific shelter and services. Research indicates that culturally specific programs produce better outcomes for youth of color. However, no Latino-focused shelter care currently exists in the county. This program fills that void.
